Analysis:

- The techniques used were Role prompting, Context, Constraints, and Output format.
    - Used Role prompting: Noise-canceling headphones - Version 2
    - Used Context: Water Bottle - Version 2, Noise-canceling headphones - Version 2, Monthly coffee subscription - Version 2
    - Used Constraints: Water Bottle - Version 2, Noise-canceling headphones - Version 2, Monthly coffee subscription - Version 2
    - Used Few-shot prompting: No
    - Used Output format: Monthly coffee subscription - Version 2

- Effects of the techniques:
    - Role prompting's Effects On Output: Role Prompting for my Nose-canceling v2 does seem to bring out a lot more flare and good hook for context of where the headphones would have sold, so it did improve the voice of the product description.
    - Context's Effects On Output: Context improves the product description focusing the content down to a fine point instead of just being general without much purpose, Eg: Water Bottle - Version 2, Noise-canceling headphones - Version 2, Monthly coffee subscription - Version 2
    - Constraints's Effects On Output: Just like Context, Constraints also improve the output by making the output more focused on its goal. For example: Water Bottle - Version 2 improves the product description by making the tone easy-to-understand for beginners instead of extreme details like the v1 of the product description.
    - Few-shot prompting Effects on Output: Did not use it.
    - Output Format's Effects on Output: This technique improves the product description of Monthly coffee subscription - Version 2 by formatting the product description into tiers which is what a subscription is about, I am not even sure what the base version this even does.
- Not that I can of but, I guess the basic prompt for Monthly coffee subscription is wired cause it tried to advised me on products, hence the images.
- I think the biggest improvement was from the jump between v1 to v2 of Monthly coffee subscription outputs since the formatting made sense in tiers and the context of the where the product description was going to be displayed just made the formatting even bigger difference.
