Notes

Part 1

There is missing information in the prompt, so the LLM response contains fabricated / potentially untrue information such as it being reusable, waterproof, durable, etc. It is missing extra details on the design of the bottle, temperature insolation, and more. It is written for customers in order to advertise the water bottle as something valuable/needed.

Part 2

For the first improved prompt, both techniques improved the output a lot. We were able to tailor the information to be more specific to our product, stopped chat from making an overly extended description, and guide the advertisement to fit our target demographic.

For the second improved prompt, we were able to tailor the output even further to even get a full script for a live ad. It was formatted into multiple segments to fit the flow that we were going for and even had estimates on how much time the whole thing would take to present. However, the times seem to be mismatched and rushed compared to how long it would actually take, and it added a fake sense of exclusiveness by fabricating the fact that the stock is limited. It is also important to note that it continued using information from our previous prompt even though I made a completely new chat.

For the third improved prompt, it continued using the information we had given in previous chats about the bottle. It did a good job trying to follow the examples and even directly copied some of the material, which may be good or bad depending on the use case. However, it was not formatted the same way and was pretty long, so some constraints on that would have made a better output.

Part 3:

Adding 3 techniques to both of our prompts allowed us to customize the output even more and get something very refined. In the first prompt I was able to format it to be a very good front-page advertisement separated into two distinct parts, all with accurate information and easy to understand phrasing. In the second prompt I was able to tailor it to sound like a real review from a website, complete with a customer call to action.

Final Thoughts:

Every technique noticeably improved the output in my use-case. It let me target the ad to different customers, change the format to fit different advertisement mediums, and supply the ad with accurate information. It's worth noting that you can use the same technique to get completely different results. For example, with role prompting I was able to get a quick, snappy script for a live video in one case, and in the other I got a long multi-paragraph detailed review. I think context is the absolute most vital technique out of all of these because we need to give the proper information. Or else, as we saw with our very first basic prompt, the LLM is happy to fabricate all the information on its own.
